Autobiography Essay

I have always believed that I grew up differently from my siblings. I have always lived, and wanted to live, a carefree type of life. My elder sister, together with my younger brother, religiously do their homework while I was there outside, chasing stray dogs, keeping wild cats, and getting myself messed up together with the kids in the neighborhood.

My father is always angry at me, but my mother never failed to come to the rescue. She always say that one day, I will be able to prove my worth, making them very proud. Of course, I was just 8 years old then, and have no idea what making my family proud means. I was only thinking of the next playing session with my friends.

Suddenly, it was during the summer of 2000, when I arrived home really shocked. My father decided to leave us for another woman. My mother, of course, did not want to give us to him. That was the turning point in my life. I was no longer the carefree kid who only thinks of playing outside. I started to look closely into people's faces, observing the way they express themselves, and started to formulate possible situations in which they are in. I did not know that I was already profiling these people.

I am currently 18 and facing the most important phases of my life. I am just about to complete my high school, and now excited to transition to college. My previous experiences in life have taught me the passion for psychology and human mind. As such, I have decided to become a psychologist. I have already worked enough to save up for schooling. I can confidently claim that I am already familiar with the job that I want to have, as I also worked at a physician's clinic for my part-time job.
